How learning styles are making jobs more interesting In this undated family handout photo, Kathryn Morris, whose story is featured in a new memoir, Light the Way Forward by Christiane Retout, poses with two of her children, from left, Amelia and Jonathan, at her home in Kentfield, Calif. Retout's memoir chronicles her journey of losing a close friend to cancer, which she said then sent her on a "dark path" she believes has helped her reevaluate her own life. (AP Photo/Family handout) By By LAURA ORTUNO, Associated Press Dec. 20, 2013 9:27 PM ET LOS ANGELES (AP) — Plush paychecks, family vacations and nice houses are nice, but even those aren't the things that make a job interesting, a therapist says. To find passion and meaning in the daily grind, people need to explore their personal lives and interests more. Even difficult or emotionally taxing jobs offer valuable payoffs, says Christiane Retout, author of a new memoir about her cancer-related journey. It chronicles her struggle with depression following the death of a good friend. It is full of lessons on how the human psyche works. Retout, who lives in southern France, said she found "enormous satisfaction" in a job that let her work and listen to audios from a suicide prevention hotline. "I knew that it was very gratifying to me to help a person who was having suicidal thoughts and feel like you did some good by saving their life. That's much more satisfying than being at a desk all day doing something you don't enjoy," Retout told The Associated Press by phone from the south of France. There's an element of career coaching in Retout's book, which she wrote with British psychoanalyst Robert Lawrence. "The reason why you're going to get fired, and then you're going to get rehired, is because you need to learn how to learn," she said. "You can train someone to be a surgeon, and he can do really excellent work. If you let him discover his own passion,
